Massage—an Anxiety Reliever

Today many companies are recognizing the effects of anxiety on their employees and are creating wellness programs in-house. Many have turned to massage therapy as an approach to anxiety and resulting stress response. Corporate giants like IBM, Apple Computers, and Ben & Jerry’s have offered on-site chair massages for their employees. Now, smaller companies are seeing the benefits of offering on-site chair massage or gift certificates for massage therapy treatments. As the workforce is getting smaller and employees are doing more, the stress levels increase. Massage therapy is a great way to address the increase of anxiety levels.

We are all more than familiar with responses that become self-perpetuating. Anxiety creates a sense of an impending emergency, “I must do something now!” The perception is that there is one emergency after another that has to be resolved now! We are so sensitized that even when a resolution has been achieved, long-term reactions linger. Muscles remain tense, causing blood vessels to constrict, releasing stress hormones such as cortisol and norepinephrine, culminating in a full-blown stress response. The sympathetic nervous system that governs the “fight or flight” response is turned so high that anxiety gets worse. We now have a state of tension that is “chronic” and that negatively impacts the immune, circulatory and digestive systems of the body.

Where downsizing has become necessary, providing on-site chair massage and certificates for massage therapy treatments is a cost-effective option to demonstrate that the company still values its staff. The company also benefits by increased productivity, increased morale and a decrease in the number of sick days. It is a “win-win” situation.

~Comments~

I listen and watch the video you have on your website every night before I go to bed. It really relaxes me. Thank you.

From the moment I arrived for my massage on Tuesday, I felt the tension leaving my body. It is so great to be greeted with the warm neck wrap & a cup of tea. The sports massage was EXACTLY the remedy for my aching marathon-training muscles! Thank you!
